Lynn Baker

Executive Presence is about developing professional credibility and managing perceptions. This is done by creating a powerful personal brand, combined with exceptional communication, effective inter-personal skills, packaged together with an impeccable personal appearance, confident composure and charisma. The Executive Presence development model designed by Lynn Baker identifies 6 key elements of success. One of these, mastering the art of Professional Speaking, ensures that important messages are clearly and concisely communicated.

Justin Cohen

He has spoken professionally for 16 years in nearly 20 countries, in virtually every industry. Justin hones his ideas to produce well-crafted content to which people can relate. He currently presents nine highly acclaimed programs in the forms of keynote presentations and workshops and is the brainchild and host of the Gurus, a business television programme.

A gifted facilitator with a unique ability to extract the key messages from each presentation. As an experienced talk show host he is able to conduct lively interviews, breaking the usual conference monotony of one presentation after another. In addition, Justin is a polished Master of Ceremonies and brings a dynamic stage presence to any event.

Ryan Hogarth

Every professional in the world today must be thinking about their Branding - how they are perceived by colleagues, clients, prospects and the world at large. Branding is one of those things that happens whether you think about it or not. You already have a brand. What do people say about you? When someone searches for you online, what do they find? That's the brand you already own. Digital branding is here and you should be thinking about it - doing something to build a brand that says who you are and what you stand for.
